There is a new order in architecture. As practitioners who make and construct we know architecture lives in an armature of relationships which brings both animate beings and inert materials into a conversation in the shaping of space.

Before a work is built, it is constructed in our minds and in conversation, and shaped by the ability to listen and respond. We centre conversation as it presents a form of knowledge which builds as it goes, open and malleable, capable of nuance, empathy and adjustment. Given the multiple contingencies of site, climate and more this order emerges bottom up. It begins by looking around us before looking inward, and recognising our own situated natures as a part of the sites we are working on. We are interested in talking about doubt, curiosity and the everyday thinking of architecture. We think these are as important as anything else, maybe more so. The world needs this ability to translate, imagine and inflect - maybe more than at any point in history.

We start with the architect as an embodied archive - and their spatial history within and beyond the subject. We build from this to an articulated and spatial point of view which then works collaboratively with others in exploring a work of fiction - which will act as the site for the semester. These books hold stories of climate, social structure, aesthetic possibilities, and (most importantly) stories of loss and belonging. A deeper read of a site than might otherwise be possible in a university - but one we recognise as quotidian in today's world.

This is an architecture found in its parts, coaxed into clarity, and joyous in its reaffirmations of the compelling cultural possibilities of architecture.
